

The Empress of Russia.

The Paris Constitutionnel, of the 28th ult., has a very curious letter upon Russian affairs. The aim of the letter, which is a very lengthy one, is to prove that the Czar is at this moment by no means averse from the idea of making proposals of peace to the allied powers; and it is supposed to be the work of the writer of the letter, who gives some details of the interior of the Court of Russia. The present Empress Maria, the Czar's wife, is represented as strongly inclined toward a line of conduct that may lead to peace, and as urging her husband toward "his point unceasingly." It is said that her influence has caused his journey to the Crimea, and that her object in making him undertake this journey was, that he should, with his own eyes, see the worst state of his troops, the discontent of the populations, the dangers, in short, that surround the long-protracted continuance of the war. The Empress's influence is represented as serving to counterbalance that of the Grand Duke Constantine, and to maintain in effect, against every chance of disaster, the man whom she thinks the safest counselor of the House of Romanoff. For the reason that he is so disliked by the fanatical Moscow party, the Arch Chancellor Count Nesselrode. Since the fall of Sebastopol, it is said that the Empress's power over her husband's mind has been growing daily, and to show how she can compass what she has once resolved upon, a little anecdote of her is told:

The Czarowitch Alexander married for love and not for any political consideration, espousing one of the loveliest, but poorest and least important of German princesses, the daughter of the Grand Duke of Hesse of Darmstadt. For many reasons the Czar was ill-disposed toward the marriage, but his son would hear of no other, and the father ended by yielding. For the months of the good people here are full of the prisoner's curious sayings while he sojourned among them. Among the expressions Wilson is said to have made use of when questioned by Mr. Rife, are the following: "I don't want to convict myself, but I might as well die for killing a sheep as a lamb." Then again he said, "Some men get sorry for committing crime, and are terribly afraid of the law, but I am not one of them; I am as well as well as to Heaven in a coach and four as in a wheelbarrow." In reference to his passionate temper when crossed, he said, "When I get mad I swell up as big as a barrel and nearly burst with rage."

Sometimes Wilson flatters himself to know of the crime imputed to him, while at other times his conversation and manner amount almost to a confession of guilt. His statements were in many cases voluntary. In fact, he seemed to take a pleasure in arguing with the villagers upon the shedding of blood. At one time he said, "Most people believe that a murdered man's blood will not wash out, now I believe it will."

A commitment being obtained from one of the country magistrates, he was determined to take Wilson to White Plains and there lodge him in jail. Accordingly, a wagon was procured, and under a guard of three men, armed with revolvers, the prisoner was safely conveyed to prison. On the road he came very near escaping by untying the ropes which he was bound.
